Skiing

GNFAC,

I was up at Bacon Rind today, nothing to notable to note but the skiing was noticeably upside down. The snow below the 3-4 inches of new snow is faceted with enough depth to notice while skiing, which does not seem typical of a NSF/Surface Hoar layer to me. Also the snow down low, where it's thinner, is overall less supportable and more faceted than at the start of the season, you hate to see it go that way!

Bring on the snow!
